

Super Specials for Labor Day Grilling

EXPAND

CNY VINTAGE

NYS Fair flashback: Rain, pickpockets and a whale carcass highlight 1890 fair

6

Updated on August 30, 2017 at 12:31 PM

Posted on August 30, 2017 at 11:11 AM

An early view of the New York State Fairgrounds are seen in this undated postcard Onondaga Historical Association (Onondaga Historical Association)

415
shares

By Johnathan Croyle, jcroyle@syracuse.com, syracuse.com

The 171st edition of the New York State Fair began last week.

Between 1842 and 1889 the fair traveled between several different New York cities including: Albany, Auburn, Buffalo, Elmira, Saratoga Springs, Syracuse and Watertown.

Factory smoke darkens the sky in this early look at the New York State Fairgrounds. Onondaga Historical Association (Onondaga Historical Association)

In 1890 a group of influential Syracuse residents, led by James Geddes, convinced the New York Society of Agriculture that the Fair should make a permanent home in Syracuse. They purchased 100 acres of land for $30,000 and donated it.

The State Fair has been a Syracuse tradition ever since.

The first State Fair, the state's 50th, at its current location saw bad weather, prohibition politics, pickpockets, and a very large, smelly and unwelcome visitor.

Heavy rain for three straight days turned the fairgrounds into a muddy mess and kept attendances low.

"It was no uncommon sight during the afternoon to see a well-dressed man standing on one foot in a mud hole, while with his umbrella he tried to fish out of the sticky soil the overshoe which had sucked from his other foot," The Daily Standard observed.

The weather broke on Sept. 15 and "attendance was large and everyone could go about where he or she pleased without the aid of a boat or rubber boots."

Standing water in puddles and ditches were around but these even "the most timid young lady could cross with the aid of her escort's arm."

Vendors tried to make up for lost time and reported a big jump in refreshment and cigar sales.

The temperance movement had its own tent and lured people inside with lemonade. Once inside signs with anti-alcohol phrases like, "Home, religion, virtue and patriotism demand your vote for lemonade," were seen and everyone left with pockets "loaded with prohibition propaganda."

Pickpockets, many of whom had arrived from out of town, were very common, and the police created special patrols to catch them.

A John Williams, of Utica, was even caught trying to steal the gold watch from former Sherriff Samuel Ferguson.

Animals were, like today, a big attraction.

The horse judging drew "many hundred pairs of eyes were focused on the magnificent Percherons, Clydesdales and Cleveland Bays as they were led prancing around the enclosure before the judges."

Mud and water had kept most people away from the pigs during the first few days, but with the sun out the Standard reported nothing could stop "cane and umbrella carrying public in getting within joking distance of the prized porkers."

The paper said, "the pig is a lazy beast and when not eating he passes his time in sleeping."

Fairgoers, in a practice that would not be tolerated today, prodded the sleeping pigs in the back until "they stood up and showed themselves."

ADVERTISING

One "beast" was denied entry into the 1890 State Fair.

Early in the year a fisherman came upon a 65-foot, 75-ton, whale which had become stranded on a beach along the Atlantic Ocean.

A 1990 Post-Standard article said the fisherman sensed he could make money on this opportunity: "He bought 60 barrels of embalming fluid, cleaned up the carcass, and loaded it up onto a barge for a tour of the Northeast."

He arrived in Syracuse on the Erie Canal in September, just in time for the State Fair.

But the summer tour and taken its toll, and the whale began to stink. The fisherman was denied entry into the Fairgrounds.

Undeterred, the fisherman floated his barge into the city and docked on North Salina Street.

"Nothing of the kind has ever been on exhibition before," gushed the Standard, who reported that 23 people could sit in the whale's mouth.

"No one should fail to view the monster as another opportunity may never present itself like it again in our city."

The Evening Herald declared on Sept. 19, 1890 the Fair a success: "The first Fair of the New York State Agricultural society upon the new and permanent grounds near this city demonstrated the assertions that Syracuse is the best place in the State for these great expositions."

Send your ideas and curiosities to Johnathan Croyle: Email | 315-427-3958.

Registration on or use of this site constitutes acceptance of our User Agreement and Privacy Policy

© 2017 Advance Media New York. All rights reserved (About Us).

The material on this site may not be reproduced, distributed, transmitted, cached or otherwise used, except with the prior written permission of Advance Media New York.

Community Rules apply to all content you upload or otherwise submit to this site.

Ad Choices

