ARTS & ENTERTAINMENT

Arts partnerships seen as way to go

MELISSA TIFFANY, owner of the Orange Line Gallery in Syrac-uge, rectangles to her galleries’ new energy and lively atmosphere.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it was a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film
Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it is a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details
of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising
costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film
Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it is
a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details
of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising
costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film
Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it is
a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details
of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising
costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film
Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it is
a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details
of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising
costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film
Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it is
a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details
of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising
costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film
Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it is
a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details
of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising
costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film
Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it is
a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details
of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising
costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film
Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it is
a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details
of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising
costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film
Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it is
a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details
of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising
costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film
Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it is
a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details
of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising
costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film
Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.

Central, Orange Line owner Melissa Tiffany confirmed it is
a three-year commitment but declined to discuss financial details
of the arrangements. Both groups also will share contacts and advertising
costs, says Tiffany.

“We need to work together to keep the arts alive,’ she said.

Knobloch, executive director of the Syracuse International Film
Festival, says the guiding principle for his organization’s partnerships is simple.

“Many of our programs are collaborations on purely artistic and educational projects,” says Knobloch.

During its seven years, the festival has partnered with many
arts groups, including the Syracuse International Film Festival, the Palace Theatre, and the Red House Arts Center.